

Jervis Bay Convoy Survivors Reach Canada

Bigger Than Pocket Battleship

The gunner believed the attacker was even bigger than a pocket-battleship," but it was too far away and dark at the time for him to make positive identification.

able Seaman Arthur Manley of Liverpool was washed out of the lifeboat by the heavy seas on their second night adrift.

"I thought I was gone, but I came up with my hat on," he said. He was pulled back to safety by his shipmates.

Pictured above is a group of British seamen survivors of the freighter Trewellard which was sunk when an enemy battleship attacked the Jervis Bay convoy in the Atlantic. Forty survivors from two ships which were victims of the attack reached an East Coast Port today.